Dissertation: A Defense of Intellectualism: Will, Intellect, and Control in Late Thirteenth-Century Philosophy

Abstract: For the philosophers of the later Middle Ages, the question of how volition is related to cognition was a question about how the faculties of the intellect and the will are related. The two most prominent views in this period were intellectualism, according to which the activity of the intellect causes that of the will, and voluntarism, according to which the activity of the intellect does not cause but is nonetheless necessary for that of the will. In general, scholars of medieval moral psychology have neglected intellectualism and praised the philosophical innovations of the voluntarists. I show that intellectualism is worth careful study, for although they were very much criticized by their contemporaries, the intellectualists have a more plausible understanding of the relationship between volition and the activity of our cognitive powers, and of human free will.
